

Administrative data may contain errors that affect economic statistics based on these data. The types of errors for administrative data can be different than for survey data. Data quality aspects and possible types of errors are explained. Several editing strategies are discussed, both for single and integrated administrative data sources. Administrative data can also be incomplete for statistical purposes. Imputation methods are treated and some examples are given regarding the use of administrative data for economic statistics.