

The geographical fragmentation of industrial production alters many of the stylized facts on which trade models are based, with profound economic and social implications at home. To guide policy makers, theory and statistics should go hand in hand: it is important to develop the right empirical tools to back academic research and identify gaps that require further attention. The presentation builds on this relationship between trade theory and statistics and suggests a road map for empirical work.